MORMON LEADERS VEXED BY BIRCH SOCIETY FOUNDER'S PRESENCE AT SAME TIME AS CHURCH CONFERENCE

Robert H. Welch Jr., founder and head of the John Birch Society, called the membership of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints "a very good recruiting ground" for the society to go to. Mr. Welch made his remarks at a news conference after arriving at Salt Lake City, Utah, to address a Birch Society dinner. His appearance caused some embarrassment to the leadership of the Mormon Church, reports Wallace Turner, of the New York Times, which has its headquarters there, and served to sharpen discussion in the church over the Birch Society.

The Society dinner was held at a time when thousands of Mormons gathered there for an international conference of the church. J. Reese Hunter, a Salt Lake City optometrist who says he originated the idea and the timing of the dinner, declared that half the tickets had been purchased by Mormons.

The church's leadership, however, had emphatically made the point that the dinner, which was held to raise funds for Birch activities in the Mountain States, was not a church function and had no connection with the church.

A leading Mormon, Ezra Taft Benson, who was Secretary of Agriculture in the Eisenhower Administration, reversed himself and decided not to introduce Mr. Welch at the dinner, reportedly after the Birch issue was raised by other leaders of the church.

Mr. Welch made his news conference remarks after he was asked if he saw any community of interest between the church and the ultra-conservative Society.

"We have never gone after recruits anywhere because they belong to any religious organization," he replied. Then he said:

"If we are looking for conservative, patriotic Americans of good character, humane consciences, and religious ideals, where would you go looking for them any more hopefully than among the Latter Day Saints?"

"The Latter Day Saints are as individuals the kind of people we would like to have in the John Birch Society," he declared.

Mr. Welch's appearance there caused a deep disagreement among the members of the Council of the Twelve Apostles of the church. It was announced a month before, for Mr. Benson, a Mormon Apostle, to introduce Mr. Welch to the banquet audience.

It became known, without formal announcement, that Mr. Benson had decided not to perform the introduction, although he still planned to attend the banquet, says the New York Times. An unimpeachable source in the church hierarchy said that Mr. Benson's withdrawal had come after its colleagues in the Council told him they were disturbed by the association of the church hierarchy with the Birch group through him.

A high church official denied that any schism existed, although he conceded that differences of opinion about the Birch Society existed. He said he hoped, as did his colleagues, that Mr. Benson would not involve the church in Birch Society problems.

None of the controversy was visible as 10,000 church members filled the Tabernacle in Temple Square for the opening of the 136th annual conference of their church.

Mr. Benson sat in the fourth chair to the left of David O. McKay, the 82-year-old spiritual leader of the 2,395,932 members claimed by the church.

The deep disagreement that exists beneath the surface is over Mr. Benson's involvement in the Birch Society attempt to recruit members among the Mormons. The church has not forbidden Birch membership, but neither has it endorsed the society.

In October, 1963, after his increasing involvement with the Birch Society led to criticism, Mr. Benson was assigned to direct the European mission of the church and left Salt Lake City for most of the next two years.

The church leadership became concerned after Mr. Hunter, originator of the dinner, sent letters in March to many Mormon bishops hailing a speech Mr. Benson had made in defense of the Birch Society, says the New York Times. Later, The Desert News, which is owned by the church, printed a statement that said in part:

"In order to avoid any misunderstanding we wish to notify bishops, other church officers, and members of the church in general, that the church is not involved in this dinner in any way, and furthermore, that the church has no connection with the John Birch Society whatsoever."

Later, the newspaper printed an editorial saying:

"Some others have wondered if the church is involved in such groups as the John Birch Society, but it is no more a part of that group than of any other political aggregation. The church has nothing to do with Communists, nothing to do with racists, nothing to do with Birchers, nothing to do with any slanted group."

In the last year or so, Mr. Benson has spoken frequently in defense of the Birch Society. He has said he is not a member, but his support of the Society's recruiting among Mormons is viewed by qualified observers at Salt Lake City

Rostow, High Official Of U.S. State, Named One Of Two Special Aides To Johnson

President Johnson recently appointed Robert E. Kintner, former head of the National Broadcasting Company, and Walt Whitman Rostow, a high-ranking official of the State Department, as special assistants. Mr. Kintner, the President said, will advise him on a broad range of matters. These will include organizational and administrative problems, the coordination of Great Society programs, reports John D. Pomfret, in the New York Times, and the recruiting of high Government officials. Mr. Kintner will also be Cabinet secretary and will handle the President's liaison with Cabinet departments and major Federal agencies.

Mr. Rostow, Mr. Johnson said, will work principally, but not necessarily exclusively, on foreign policy. In announcing the appointments at a news conference, Mr. Johnson said that he would look to Mr. Rostow to develop long range plans in the foreign policy field and particularly to coordinate development plans in Latin America.

It appears that Mr. Rostow will assume largely the functions formerly performed by McGeorge Bundy, who left the White House in February to become president of the Ford Foundation.

Mr. Johnson, however, did not give Mr. Rostow the title held by Mr. Bundy — Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. Mr. Johnson did not indicate as much, but it is assumed that Mr. Rostow will also become the White House representative on the new senior interdepartmental group, headed by Under Secretary of State George Ball, which will co-ordinate U. S. overseas programs. Mr. Rostow's appointment had been anticipated in some quarters, but Mr. Kintner's came as a complete surprise.

Asked whether it could be said that Mr. Rostow would take over many of Mr. Bundy's duties, Mr. Johnson replied:

"It could be, but that would be inaccurate. It would not be true. Most of the men play any position here, we hope. Part of the work Mr. Bundy did we will say will now be done by Mr. [Robert] Komer (recently elevated from deputy special assistant to special assistant to the President for reconstruction in Vietnam). Some of the work Mr. Bundy did is now being done by Jack Valenti and Bill Moyers (both special assistants to the President)."

"There will be some of the things Mr. Valenti and Mr. Moyers formerly did that Mr. Kintner will as dividing the church's top leadership.

"The church is in danger of undergoing its greatest schism since the days of polygamy," said Dr. J. D. Williams, a professor of political science at the University of Utah, who is an official of the church at the middle level.

"This is the first major crisis in the church since its decision to abandon polygamy," said Dr. Sterling McCarrin, provost of the University of Utah. A close observer of Mormon affairs, he is a member of the church but is not active in its work.

"What is involved here," Dr. McCarrin said, "is a typical Mormon abhorrence of extremism. The leadership of this church is politically conservative, but it is not extremist."

do. He will be special assistant. He will be paid $30,000 a year.

President Johnson's apparent reluctance to fill Mr. Bundy's job by a single replacement may indicate, according to informed sources, that he will never do so. He seems reluctant to put in the hands of one man the kind of power within Government that Mr. Bundy had. In effect, says the New York Times, Mr. Bundy created within the White House a little State Department that rode herd on many aspects of foreign policy.

The President apparently intends to shift many of the policy-making aspects of the post back to the State Department, using a number of men inside the White House as personal advisers to him on foreign affairs.

Mr. Kintner, fifty-six years old, is a graduate of Swarthmore College. He was chairman of the board of the National Broadcasting Company. The post was an interim one until his resignation from N.B.C.

Nazi To Die By Guillotine For Deaths Of 70,000

Horst Fischer, a former SS doctor, was sentenced to death by East Germany's Supreme Court for crimes against humanity. He was responsible for the deaths of at least 70,000 inmates of the Nazis' Auschwitz camp.

Dr. Heinrich Toeplitz, president of the court, said Fischer "in an atrocious manner took part in the crime of genocide planned and carried out by the Fascist regime of terror," says the New York Times. Fischer was found guilty of having selected inmates, mostly Jews, to die in the Auschwitz gas chambers. The fifty-three-year old, gray-haired Fischer stood impassively as sentence was pronounced.

During the ten-day trial thirty-nine witnesses from a number of European countries testified they had seen him send prisoners into the gas chambers with a flip of his hand. Stationed at a ramp where trains arrived with Jews from Poland and other countries, Fischer, they testified, singled out for the gas chambers women, children, and old people not strong enough to work.

He was one of several Nazi doctors involved. Some have been sentenced in West German courts to prison terms. Others are still at large in Latin America and Africa.

Fischer, who lived in hiding in East Germany for ten years, was arrested last June on a warrant issued by a West German court. His execution, by guillotine, will be the first in East Germany since 1963, when another Nazi criminal was executed. West Germany has abolished capital punishment, says the New York Times, but in East Germany the death penalty has been retained.

The state of North Rhine-Westphalia announced that eighteen former members of a Gestapo force that occupied the area of Stanislaw, in East Galicia, during World

MARGOLIN WAS ONE OF THE TWO SURVIVING FOUNDERS OF UNIQUE AID GROUP FROM AKKERMAN

The death of Akiba Margolin at eighty-two left only one surviving founder of a unique group of immigrants from the same little town in Czarist Russia, organized sixty-nine years ago to help others from that town to come to the U.S. and, later, to go to Israel, says the New York Herald Tribune. The name of the organization is the Akkerman Benevolent Association, which started with thirty-five charter members, grew to a membership of four hundred, all from Akkerman, and has dwindled now to forty-eight men and eighteen women.

The group has a secretary and meets occasionally, chiefly for sentimental reasons, for its purpose has been achieved, and any new activity involves the task of making a strong new Akkerman Benevolent Association in Israel, with four hundred members assisted in going there by the New York parent organization.

The sole founding survivor is Philip Stiveband, also eighty-two, of 2700 Grand Concourse, the Bronx. As with Mr. Margolin, he is a retired real-estate dealer and builder. Both came to the United States in 1904, but not together, from Akkerman, a town in Bessarabia near Odessa, where they knew each other.

Mr. Margolin died in Brookdale Hospital Center in Brooklyn, formerly known as Beth-El Hospital, of which he was a trustee for forty-three years. He lived at 34 Plaza Street, Brooklyn, and while retired from construction work, still dabbled in Long Island real-estate appraisals and brokerage until his final illness.

By the time the Association had achieved its original goal of assisting in the integration in America of home-town immigrants, Akkerman was known as the Soviet city

War II would be tried in mid-April on charges of mass murder of Jews.

The indictment linked the eighteen with the slaughter of some 120,000 Jewish residents of the Stanislaw area between 1941 and 1943.

The principal defendant will be 55-year-old Hans Krüger, who served as chief of security police in the Stanislaw area in 1941 and 1942. The charges say that the Nazi slayings got under way in the Stanislaw area, reports the New York Times, under Krüger with the murder of six hundred Jewish physicians, lawyers, and rabbis.

of Belgorod-Dnestrovski. The American immigrants, most of whom had prospered in their new country, continued to raise money and in the 1930s, says the New York Herald Tribune, contributed $50,000 toward the construction of a fifty-bed hospital in the town they still called Akkerman.

When the new State of Israel was established in 1948, the Association set up a $10,000 loan fund for immigrants to the new land, and in the next ten years made two hundred loans without suffering a single default.

Originally, there were some six thousand Jewish residents of the Akkerman area, but the tide of immigration petered out after World War II. A few came to the United States as displaced persons and the rest of those remaining in Akkerman went to Israel.

Mr. Margolin started to work for construction firms in Brooklyn soon after his arrival in New York sixty-two years ago, and formed his own building organization in 1919.

Surviving are a son, Prof. Leo J. Margolin, dean of administration at the Borough of Manhattan Community College, says the New York Herald Tribune; a daughter, Mrs. Rose M. Fishkin, of Detroit; four grandchildren; and six great-grandchildren.

He transferred back and forth between government service and teaching for a number of years and, beginning in 1950, spent eleven years as professor of economic history at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

In 1961, he was appointed by President Kennedy as deputy special assistant for national security affairs at the White House. In December of the same year he became counselor and chairman of the Policy Planning Council at the State Department.

WHERE ANGELS FEAR TO TREAD

By Harry E. Wedeck, in Jewish Affairs

Mrs. Barshon looked quietly at her son David. He was bent over the kitchen table, a pile of books beside him, notebooks and pencils scattered along side.

She looked at him affectionately, wistfully. Her eyes took in his fair hair, with her own fair coloring, his straight profile, his wakeful look. He gave the impression of fitting into any group, without trailing with him, as her poor Menasheh did, vestiges of his ethnic past.

There flashed into her mind a brief glimpse of David, reluctantly dragged to the synagogue by Menasheh. It was a Yom Kippur Eve. How the years lengthened, yet each day so endless, so infinite.

David went on writing. Mrs. Barshon turned her head toward the stove. What would David do now? Perhaps he would win another bursary? But how many could he achieve? What would he do when he graduated? And time was moving on. And he was now eighteen. And then? And then? The future blurred out, a hazy mist.

Mrs. Barshon sighed. She sighed to some extent for the doubtful future, full of perplexities; and, to a very little extent, she sighed on her own behalf. That sticking pain made her gasp. It did not recur often, it was true, but when it did come it left her breathless. What was the point in worrying Menasheh? Or David? Pains come and go. And this one too, with the help of the One Above, would go.

Mrs. Barshon busied herself with the pots that were steaming by the fire.

Finally David raised his head.

"Hello, Ma," he exclaimed.

Mrs. Barshon smiled gently.

"You're always busy these days, David. Always with your books."

"I've got exams, and I have to take another bursary examination in six weeks."

"Yes, David. That we know. But you don't give yourself any rest. Your father believes a man must be tied to books, day and night, all his life. Is that really a way of living?"

"What else can I do?"

"I know. I know. But I was talking only yesterday to Mrs. Sinkowitz. She's not a bad woman. Her son, that's something else. But she and I talked. She had a daughter. You know her name — Naomi. Perhaps you've seen her?"

David made a non-committal sound.

Mrs. Sinkowitz asked: "Why don't you take her out sometime? For a walk. Or for tea. Or Saturday night. It would be a change for you, David."

David regarded his mother. Suddenly, as if for the first time, he saw her clearly. Saw the lines creasing her forehead, the criss-cross wrinkles under her eyes, the furrows about her mouth. A pang of affection shot through him. She had a harassed life, he realized with a strange lucidity.

Always in the kitchen. Planning and scheming to make ends meet. Worried about the present. Worried about the future. Worried about Menasheh and his dubious temporary jobs. And worried most about her son and his future.

He extended his hand.

"All right, ma. I'll think it over. Maybe next week, when the exams are over."

Mrs. Barshon said nothing, but a quick cheerfulness brightened her face. With renewed zest she resumed her cooking.

The Sinkowitz family lived in Hope Park Terrace, in a large, sprawling apartment. When David hesitantly rang the bell on Saturday evening at five, there was a sound of scurrying behind the door. Then slowly a maid, prim in starched uniform, opened.

"Is Miss Sinkowitz in?" David asked.

"Who shall I say?"

"David Barshon."

She closed the door, and let him wait in the hall. In a few moments Mrs. Sinkowitz appeared, advancing like a ship in full sail.

"Oh, David Barshon, how do you do?" she crowed.

David mumbled a reply.

"Come into the parlour, please. Naomi will be right in. She's in her own room, you know. The family is out."

David guessed as much. Mr. Sinkowitz must be out at a card game where big stakes were playing. And Sam Sinkowitz must be out at the same game, or on his way to a similar one. The Sinkowitz family had their routine, and were faithful to it.

As David sat down on a soft armchair and waited, he looked around the room. It was so comfortable, packed with small tables and plants, soft cushions and sideboards, and chairs that it gave a sense of ease, like being in the heart of a luxury department store. Yes, that was what he would have wanted for his mother — and his father too.

There was his mother, always worrying, perpetually counting the half-pennies. There was his father as well with all his rigidity in the matter of Sabbath observances; still harassed by the morrow, by the rent, by his unsteady jobs.

A queer world, David reflected, as the gloaming came stealing through the windows and the night began to wrap itself about the objects in the room. Maybe the Sinkowitzs are living on a different plane, understandable to the One Above, and particularly pleasing to the One Above. Maybe books and studying and such things were an illusion, a vanity.

His thoughts roamed waveringly along the picture of his own home, and a gush of sheer sadness came to him. He did not hear the soft steps, sweeping over the soft rugs.

He looked up startled when he heard a throaty voice greet him: "Hello, David. Why, you're in the dark!" Naomi Sinkowitz turned to the door and called: "Jessie! Lights in the sitting room!"

Then she turned to David.

"These maids, they're so lazy. I've heard about you. They say you're always winning bursaries."

David mumbled self-consciously.

Meanwhile Jessie entered and turned on the gas lights. A glow of warmth swept through the room.

David looked up at Naomi. She sat in front of him, on the settee, her legs crossed. She was brown-haired, and her cheeks had a few freckles, he noted. But her lips were full and red, and there was a warm glint in her eyes. Her dress he did not notice. He just felt that the velvety stuff she wore draped her well.

She rose and came over, standing beside him. He inhaled the perfume that came from her clothes. She looked warm and desirable. "What about the Green Cafe? Or somewhere in Princes Street?"

He fingered the shillings in his pocket. Why had his mother given them to him? She needed them so much more herself. "And the pictures afterward?"

David nodded.

"Just a minute. I'll get my hat and things."

She ran out of the room. David waited, near the door.

As she passed, Jessie the maid muttered, half audibly: "Och, her and her ways."

But the words echoed against the closing door as David fed Naomi out.

In the dusk, as they strolled along, David again was aware of the perfume from her dress. She took his arm, snuggling against his side. He felt the warmth of her, her firm body against his side. He could feel, too, as they talked, her side glances, appraising. She was reckoning up his value in relation to the young fellows — boisterous, impudent, smart — that her brother often brought home with him. They were always ready for a bit of "fun." They never were at a loss: throwing smart comments about the room, talking about the latest vaudeville act, or a race, or a football match. Now and then one would steal up to her or give her a hug.

She didn't mind. It meant nothing, either way. But this David now. He seemed different. She sensed it without explaining why. He talked softly. Sometimes he seemed to hesitate. She liked these hesitations. They gave her a feeling that he was choosing words and phrases for her sake alone. But he said nothing personal, nothing intimate. His hands never strayed, even when, after passing down the Bridges, they entered the darkened Green Cafe and found a corner table. Even when they got to the moving pictures and settled comfortably in the soft logs.

She liked that. It meant something to her, something she had wanted, making her feel an individuality, not as if she were always there, to be played with and pinched and laughed with and taken out.

Her hand moved slowly, dexterously along the seat. She felt David's hand clutching the programme. He sat intent, because the pictures themselves were a rarity enough to make him interested. This was his evening out, but it was also his own evening.

He sat immobile. Then he abruptly felt the soft, flexible fingers of Naomi creeping over his sleeve. He took her hand in his. It was cool. Naomi moved, raised herself, and sat down again so that her dress draped over his coat. He could feel her nearness, and his attention left the picture. His hand moved toward her waist. He stooped a little and in the darkness pressed his face to hers. His lips met hers. He felt the soft moistness of them urgent on him. His pulse pounded. He was ablaze with desire.

Suddenly the lights went on. He jerked himself up, releasing her hand. In the semi-glow of the intermission he glanced at her. She did not speak, only pressed close to him, her lips tantalizing, her hair brushing his cheek.

It seemed hours later that they slowly left the movies and stood around on the sidewalk for a moment. It was after eleven, and the traffic on Prince Street had stilled into a low murmur. On the murky horizon loomed the sullen mass of the Castle. In the foreground the shagbiness of the Gardens lay folded in gloom. People were strolling leisurely. Mostly couples absorbed in each other. There was the subdued hum of talk, whispering, restrained giggles. "Where shall we go now, David?" Naomi asked. Her eyes looked dark and lustrous, and her lips stood out invitingly. To David she was something new, some bookish vision become a reality, a symbol. He had forgotten her brother, her home. The Sinkowitzs were washed from his mind. He felt only the palpitant urge to her.

"Let's go down Leith Street. There's some restaurant there open all night."

They went into an obscure little bar off the main street. It had little tables set around the walls. Couples sat hunched over, sipping drinks.

David found a table, half way down the long narrow room. His hesitant manner showed his lack of acquaintance with such places. But Naomi was poised. She pointed to a better table. The waiter shrugged, indifferent.

David was about to order. What would she like? He was debating with himself, when a figure approached. It was a tall, pasty fellow, overdressed, with his sleek black hair shining under the glow of the light.

"Hello, Naomi!" He greeted her as if he had just left her a moment before.

She answered with a wide smile. The fellow nodded toward David. "Meet my friend, David Barshon. This is Jake. Jake Goldberg."

David held out his hand. Jake nodded, keeping his hands in his pockets. David flushed.

"Coming over, Naomi, to-night?" Jake asked. "We got a party at the old place."

He spoke through closed lips, standing close to Naomi, his eyes on her body.

"You see, Jake, I didn't know. We've been out already this evening. Went to the pictures."

"Come on, Naomi." Jake took her by the arm. She did not resist. For a second, she turned.

"I'm sorry, David. I'll see you again. Some time."

"What you want to see him again for, Naomi?" Jake spluttered. Then he whispered to her. She beat her head to hear. A giggle escaped her. She moved off with Jake.

For a moment David sat still. The waiter came over. "These wimmin," he said to the ceiling.

David rose slowly, and slowly walked home up Leith Street. It was beginning to drizzle, a soft, gentle rain. He did not mind. It fell in with his mood. It was gray and forlorn.

He walked home without observing the straggling, sprawling avenue, without awareness of the shuffling tramps who luridly passed him. When, in the early hours, he reached home, he suddenly felt a warmth, as if he had come into safety.

He heaved a silent sigh. Softly he turned the key and in the dark crept into his own room. For hours he lay awake. He tried to concentrate. In his memory he coned over some French poems. He went over an ode of Horace. But the picture of the perfumed Naomi intruded. She looked so desirable. Could she be so double-dealing? It must be that Jake's fault, that sleek Jake Goldberg... slick like Sam Sinkowitz himself. Of course they all belonged to the same gang... gamblers and touts, with their women so easy, so accessible. He felt remote from them, yet eager to be of them.

In the dawn he dropped into drowsiness, his mind washed blank.

At breakfast, Mrs. Barshon asked, as if with indifference: "Did you have a nice time David?"

"Mmm," he murmured. "Ah," Mrs. Barshon responded, understandingly.

Mrs. Charles Bellamy, 4850 Mile Road, Montreal, left, is national chairman of the "Scopus Cultural Series" of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. Dr. Samuel Johnson, right, of New York, an eminent sociologist, and director of the National Foundation for Hebrew Culture, in the United States, was the guest speaker at a Scopus meeting, at the Ritz Carlton Hotel, on "Jewish Peoplehood: A Modern View". The Series is a programme aimed at broadening and stimulating Jewish cultural appreciation, to develop interest in the Hebrew University.

faiths with the State of Israel and world Jewry.

He called it a miracle, indeed, that a land like Israel, with 80 different tongues, could settle upon Hebrew even in vernacular versions. Quoting Golda Meir's famous saying, "He who does not believe in miracles in Israel is not a realist," he showed how the Hebrew renaissance, started in the 1850's in the Holy Land, bridged over, fortunately so that by the time poetry and literature generally enjoyed its newborn resurgence, it was usable "per se."

Dr. Blumenfeld recalled the interest of early American academicians in Hebrew. He said that Samuel Johnson, the first president of Columbia University, had expressed the belief that "as soon as a lad has learned to speak and read English well, it is best to begin a learned education with Hebrew, the modern of all language and eloquence." Another early college president, Charles Channoy, the second president of Harvard, he said, read a chapter of the Old Testament in the College Hall every morning, first in the original Hebrew, and then in English.

This early interest in Hebrew, he also pointed out, was manifested in the fact that the seals of such outstanding universities as Columbia, Dartmouth, and Yale include the college mottoes in the original Hebrew, which is still preserved in the seals used today.

In introducing Gabriel Preil, who read his poetry in both Hebrew and English, Dr. Blumenfeld said he is a man who has dedicated his life exclusively to poetry. Calling him the outstanding Hebrew poet now residing in the United States, he said that "his pen moves in New York, but his voice resounds in Israel."

He praised Dr. Alter's rich contributions to the interpretation of Hebrew poetry in the English-speaking world, and for his own considerable body of poetry.

In a long and fascinating talk, Dr. Alter paid tribute to the unique attributes of Hebrew as a language for poetry and the great renaissance of poetry in Israel today. "Israel is probably one of the few remaining countries where verse, far from being a dying technique, has managed to stay at the vital center of literary culture. Israel may conceivably have the highest per capita production of poetry in the world, and it is an even safer bet that it has the highest rate anywhere of poetry consumption. In Israel, contemporary verse is read as well as written. A popular book of poetry sells out a first printing of 3,000 copies within a few months. Comparing the population of Israel and the United States, a printing of 3,000 in Israel looms as large perhaps as half a million copies of a book published in America."

"It is absurd to claim that one language is intrinsically more poetic than another, but one can nevertheless say of Hebrew that its unique history makes it a supple instrument for certain species of poetic expression that have never been, or no longer are, available to poets in the major Western languages. More than anything else, what makes Hebrew poetry different is the vital presence of the Bible, through remembered words, phrases and verses. With the Bible always in the background, a skillful Hebrew poet can shift perspective or tone, introduce irony, focus two or three meanings on a single point, with a carefully weighted allusion to a Biblical text."

"Also, because the whole body of ancient and medieval Hebrew literature continually sets man over against God, the creative world over against the void, and time over against eternity, the language is rich in words that express ultimate things. When a contemporary English poet trots out a world-embracing word, he generally has to do it with an embarrassed grin or a defensively intellectual

The Hebrew Language In Colonial America

By Henry W. Levy, of the Jewish Agency, American Section

On the Mayflower, as it sailed across the Atlantic almost 350 years ago with its shipload of Puritans, there was a little known meeting at which the subject of discussion was the choice of an official language for the settlement that was to be made at the unknown American port that was later to be named Plymouth. One of the serious possibilities was Hebrew.

This story was told by Lloyd Haberly, president of the Poetry Society of America at a recent meeting attended by some 150 poets and classical scholars. Declaring that many of the Mayflower group voiced a desire to make Hebrew the official language of the new world settlements, Mr. Haberly said: "We don't appreciate how closely we came to being talking in Hebrew. But Governor Bradford, of the Massachusetts Colony, taught himself the language, nevertheless, in order to have access to the fountain of the spirit."

The occasion was a meeting of the Poetry Society of America and the department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency for Israel. The subject was, "The Hebrew Renaissance With Particular Reference to Modern Hebrew Poetry." Its site was the New York Genealogical and Biographical Society on New York's East 58th Street, a hall more accustomed to learned research and discussion on America's first families, the descendants of the Mayflower and other colonial families.

Paralleling the thesis advanced by the noted historian, Lecky, that "Hebrew mortar cemented the foundations of American democracy," President Haberly opened the meeting saying: "As Thebes rose, the monks stopped preaching and teaching to chant the Hebrew psalms. And when that world moved to our own, the psalms were once again the key to the whole spiritual transformation of time and place."

Other speakers at this unique program devoted to the Hebrew language were Dr. Samuel Blumenfeld, director of the Department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency for Israel; Dr. Robert Alter, Professor of Literature at Columbia University, a distinguished Hebraist; and Gabriel Preil, foremost Hebrew poet in the United States.

Dr. Blumenfeld, pointing out that the revival of modernized Hebrew in Israel has helped to lift the sacred tongue out of the category of dead languages, in which Greek and Latin still find themselves, said that he hardly need remind a group of men of letters that Hebrew is the key to a classic literature which records the intimate experiences and memories of an ancient people. He felt that modern Hebrew can also serve as a bond of unity for all men of all

ALL SORTS AND CONDITIONS OF MEN

By Richard J. Needham, of the Toronto Globe and Mail

The wind bloweth where it listeth. John Keats came from a father who cleaned stables and carried horses for a living. Goethe never spent a day in school, neither did Edison. An unsuccessful singer who lived from hand to mouth produced Ludwig von Beethoven. Leonardo da Vinci was born out of wedlock to a notary and a serving-maid. The father and mother of Albert Einstein were virtually illiterate peasants.

It's against this background that I find myself brooding over the report on immigration procedures made to the Canadian Government by the distinguished Toronto lawyer, Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C. The tone of his report is indicated by such sentences as these: "The mere physical presence of a person in Canada gives him no special privileges. . . . The Act should state clearly that admission to Canada is a privilege and not a right."

Mr. Sedgwick is disturbed over the extent of sponsored immigration, which runs heavily among such family-conscious people as the Italians, Greeks and Portuguese. They've been bringing over their unskilled fathers, mothers, brothers, uncles, cousins and fiancées. He would let unskilled people come in under sponsorship only if they were the husband or wife of minor dependent child of the sponsor. The present system, Mr. Sedgwick protests, is letting in "large numbers of unskilled and functionally illiterate adults."

That's the case. But unskilled and totally, not functionally, illiterate people are entering Canada by another movement, and a much larger one. While roughly 150,000 human beings, skilled or unskilled, are brought in by plane or ship every year, roughly 500,000 are brought in by the stork. Some of the half-million babies born in Canada annually will turn out to be geniuses, some to be criminals, some to be clods. That's always the chance you take with people.

The children who grow up in Canada generally get some kind of skill which enables them to make a living; and so do the immigrants who arrive here. Toronto knows this better than any other city. Unskilled people have been piling in here for almost 20 years now, and what's the result? Massive unemployment? Not at all. The vast majority picked up skills and went to work. Toronto's problem isn't a surplus of labor; it's a continuous shortage of labor, both skilled and unskilled, to sustain the city's exciting growth. Much of the credit for that growth belongs to Greeks, Italians and Portuguese who came here with nothing but a pair of hands.

Speaking for Toronto's Italian community, Victor Barnato says, "This is a huge country with lots of vacant land." It is indeed; and if we're going to fill it up — as we must if we're going to retain any sort of sovereignty — we can't be too fastidious about the people we bring in here. The United States is rich and powerful today because, during the Nineteenth Century, it took millions upon millions of people with little in the way of skills or schooling. It gambled on human beings, and it won.

The Canadian historian, Arthur Lower, has often mentioned what he calls the penuriousness toward life of English-speaking Canada; its disposition to view human beings as problems and handicaps rather than opportunities and assets. One gets the feeling of this penuriousness, this anxiety about human beings, from Mr. Sedgwick's report; and especially from his proposal that immigrants should be fingerprinted and registered and required to report to the authorities from time to time until they got their citizenship.

This would help to keep out criminals and impostors, he says. Perhaps it would; though I'd suggest there's a bit of the criminal and the impostor in every one of us, whether we were born in Lindsay or Lubbock or Livorno. People are a risk, life itself is a risk; the only safe human beings — safe in themselves, or to society at large — are the dead ones.

Is Canada on the side of life or on the side of death? Is it for people or against them? What bothers me about all the regulations and restrictions Mr. Sedgwick suggests, what bothers me about all the regulations and restrictions which now exist, is that they're anti-people; and you don't build a nation that way. Canada needs people — all sorts and conditions of men — more than it needs anything else. It needs to put itself on the side of life.

W.I.C. INSTITUTE OF JEWISH AFFAIRS MARKS 25th YEAR OF TRACING NAZI WAR CRIMINALS

When the World Jewish Congress established its research arm, the Institute of Jewish Affairs, in 1941, one of its planned post-war activities was to bring to justice the Nazis responsible for the decimation of European Jewry. Today, twenty-five years later, the Institute of Jewish Affairs in New York is engaged in the task of tracing witnesses, now scattered all over the world, to give evidence in dozens of trials of Nazi criminals in process on in the investigation stage.

A survey of these activities was given at a luncheon marking the 25th anniversary of the Institute in the Americana Hotel, in New York. Dr. Jacob Robinson, who founded the Institute in 1941 and was its director until 1947, outlined the work of the Institute against the background of the international Jewish problems during World War II and in the postwar period.

Samuel Brothman, vice-president of the World Jewish Congress, and chairman of the North American Executive, who presided, stated that the Institute had succeeded in locating more than five thousand witnesses, of whom about five hundred have given evidence in person at a number of trials. Through World Jewish Congress offices and affiliated communities, witnesses have been traced in Europe, North and South America, and in Israel.

Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Jewish Congress, who discussed current tasks of the Institute, paid tribute to the memory of the late Nehemiah Robinson who succeeded his brother, Jacob, as director of the Institute in 1947.

Dr. Jacob Robinson, who is now

co-ordinator of research studies connected with the Jewish catastrophe, said that during the war and throughout the Nazi persecution and physical destruction of the Jews, the Institute had followed the events in occupied Europe by utilizing the press of those areas, as well as the press of the free world, and of such listening posts close to the Nazi realm as Geneva and Lisbon.

Convinced that the Nazis in the final analysis would be defeated and the future of the world would be in the hands of the Allies, the Institute, Dr. Robinson recalled, "had planned the future activities of the World Jewish Congress not on the basis of obsolete clichés, but bearing in mind the realities of a postwar world: an uprooted Jewry in need of relief and rehabilitation; guarantees for the future of the Jews in the former Axis European satellites; Germany's responsibility vis-a-vis the Jewish people, material, legal, and moral; and the prosecution of Nazi war criminals and their collaborators."

Dr. Robinson stated that these activities, started during the war, were continued in the postwar period, with special emphasis on restitution and compensation on the one hand, and the prosecution of war criminals on the other.

The former director of the Institute said that at present the latter "is the most important operational task of the Institute." Dr. Robinson said it should be noted that the Institute's "judicial assistance in the prosecution of the Nazi war criminals is the only one officially recognized in the totality of the Jewish Diaspora."

EBAN CALLS FOR MORE IMMIGRATION TO ISRAEL

The Israeli Government should play a more active part in encouraging Western immigration, Foreign Minister Abba Eban said at the fifteenth national conference of Hachadut Olei Britania, the British Settlers Association, at Netanya, says Israel Digest. Mr. Eban called on British Jewry to contribute at least 5,000 of its members to Israel every year. This would not deplete British Jewry and it would transform Israel, he said.

Regarding Israel's position in the Middle East, Mr. Eban said that international support went to those who settle their problems peacefully.

The three basic trends on which Israeli diplomacy depended were: the balance of deterrent power; the opposition of the world community to the use of force; and the development of pluralism in the Arab world.

"It is a safer bet to put money on Arab diversity than on unity. Nothing divides them more than the drive for unity," he said.

Mayor Moshe Shaked brought the greetings of the Municipality to the conference, which went on next day to discuss organizational questions, methods of encouraging immigration and the absorption of immigration from Britain. Several newcomers described their experiences and criticized delays and red tape in the work of the Jewish Agency departments responsible for helping immigrants to settle.

Resolutions were passed urging the Jewish Agency to give the immigrants' associations more responsibility in dealing with new arrivals, as suggested by Louis Pincus, chairman of the Agency, at the recent meeting of the Zionist General Council, and to furnish its representatives abroad with more accurate information for intending immigrants.

glare. A Hebrew poet can still use such terms with a straight face even with unaffected, colloquial directness.

"The body of good poetry that has been written in Israel is quite impressive and a great deal of this high quality is attributable partly to the poets' success in tapping the distinctive resources of the Hebrew language. What makes poetry important in Israel, is that the sensitive Hebrew reader can find in it a way to responding humanly to his world, to its beauty as well as to its terror, which is simply not available to him in any other medium."

"Today, there are courses in Hebrew in at least 200 institutions of higher learning throughout the United States. And many high schools, including the New York system, now include Hebrew as a regular curriculum course. This is all very encouraging to us in the field of Hebrew education, and it indicates that the Poetry Society of America's meeting devoted to Hebrew will not long occupy the unique position it holds today."
